Why is school food important?

There is an obesity epidemic in this country, and the emotional and financial costs of this epidemic are huge. The UK has the highest rate of childhood obesity in Europe, with 25% of young people being classified as obese or overweight. The Government's Foresight report suggests this will only get worse, with 48% of Britons expected to be obese by 2025 – unless we all do something about it.

A school meal accounts for one-third of a child's daily nutritional intake. For many children up and down the country, the majority of food they are fed at home is either made up of ready meals or – in the worst cases – nothing at all. This means the meal they eat at school will be the only nutritious food they eat that day. Encouraging children to make better food choices at school is absolutely vital.

Jamie Oliver, an English chef, has long advocated that children who are fed better, do better. Recent research supports this and has proved that no matter what background a child is from, a hot, nutritious meal at lunchtime improves their behaviour and concentration in the classroom. This is yet another reason why school meals should matter to everyone who cares about the future of the UK's children.

It's never too late to learn... even when we're fast asleep

STEVE CONNOR, Monday, 27 August 2012

Good news for dozy students at the back of the class – scientists have shown 0 while asleep.

A study, published in the journal Nature Neuroscience, found that volunteers were able to recall something they had heard while sleeping when they awoke the next day, 23.

The experiment focused on teaching the brain 24 – as people can be exposed to these stimuli without waking up. Researchers monitored the sleeping volunteers' nostril movements and found that the pleasant scent of shampoo, for instance, led to deep intakes of air, 25 caused the volunteers to briefly stop inhaling.

26, the sleeping individuals learnt to associate the sound of particular tones with certain smells. For instance, they breathed more deeply when played the positive tone even when no smell was present.

"The next day, the now awake subjects again heard the tones alone – 27. Although they had no conscious recollection of listening to them during the night, their breathing patterns told a different story," said a spokesman for the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel. "When exposed to tones that had been paired with pleasant odours, they sniffed deeply, while the second tones – 28 – provoked short, shallow sniffs," he added.

Anat Arzi, a research student at Weizmann who carried out the study, said: "The common knowledge is that although the sleeping brain can process, consolidate and strengthen information, 29. We showed that it could." He added: "There will be clear limits on what we can learn in sleep, but I speculate that they will be beyond what we have demonstrated."

The researchers intend to continue investigating other types of brain processing in various altered states of consciousness 30.
